I think that I learn best how to do something when I am first shown how to do something visually and told what it is that I should look for and watch for as I do whatever it is I'm doing. That being said I much prefer to then try my hand at what it is I am trying to learn. I feel if I don't practice it for myself then I can't actually get the ideas or concepts down. I know that practice makes perfect. However I do have a decent memory for taking tests and what not. In my history classes for example I would sometimes take notes on the lectures, but I also didn't usually study for tests, and for the most part would do fine, granted it could pick up and remember concrete details that have a fact about them. So in that case I learn well from auditory learning practices, so I don't really know where or what I think about the results of the test.
